Good Morning John,

My name is Dan and I'm a graduate of The Iron Yard. I've introduced myself to Cameron, but wanted to reach out to you as well since I saw you're looking to hire a front end developer. I'm experienced in both front end and back end technologies, and am looking to join a small, high-achieving team where I can continue to grow as a well-rounded developer.

First thing you should know about me is that I'm a problem solver. I'm interested in and passionate about a lot of different things, but ultimately I'm driven by my fascination for making things work. I love sports and data, and have spent many hours comparing stats to choose my optimal lineups. The tools you all are building at RotoGrinders are awesome, and I know I can help contribute to making them even better in the future.

 While it's still early in my development career, I'm no stranger to fast-paced, demanding environments. There's still a lot I'm excited to learn, but I'm not someone you'll have to coddle. I know how to self teach, how to ask good questions and do my research, so that I add value to my team rather than waste my senior dev's time.

Having started my own company before, I know how important it is for each team member to be nimble, innovative, and to be able to think outside of their job description. I want to be a great developer and grow into a long term pillar of any team that I join.

In closing, I am thrilled at the possibility of joining the RotoGrinders team and would love to talk more about the opportunity. I appreciate your consideration and look forward to hearing from you soon.

Many Thanks,

Daniel McBryde
